PART—I

Historical Background

History has its surprises. Australia is too big a continent to have ever been missed by explorers. A continent, approximately three million square miles in area – about 32 times that of the United Kingdom and slightly less than that of the U.S.A., remained out of sight for hundreds of years. As far back as in the sixteenth century there were rumours among explorers of the existence of a continent in the Pacific, south of the Equator, but no attempt is recorded until the early seventeenth century to discover the unknown 'Terra Australis'. Explorations by the English, Portuguese, Dutch, Spanish and French sailors in the early seventeenth century happened to be confined to the most barren land of the continent. They did not result in any settlement. Captain James Cook who was commissioned by the Royal Society of London to lead a scientific expedition to Tahiti to make astronomical observation of Venus' orbit around the sun (June 1, 1769) was asked to sail further south to discover more about the little-known continent. He reached the east coast of Australia on August 23, 1770 and hoisted the English flag in Possession Island taking formal possession of Eastern Australia in the name of the king of England.

Spread of Settlements

History has its paradoxes too. If it was the search for freedom that brought the early Pilgrim Fathers to the shores of ancient America, it was the search for a dumping ground to get rid of convicts and unwanted men that first opened the gates of Australia for settlement. Taking a cue from the reports of Captain Cook about a viable settlement in the country, the British Parliament decided to make an experiment of a convict colony in the eastern coast. A fleet of eleven ships carrying the first batch of criminals numbering 726 and about 304 British explorers, under the command of Captain Arthur Phillip, anchored at Port Jackson (now, Sydney Harbour) on January 26, 1788. This day on which the British flag was unfurled on the Australian soil is now commemorated as 'Australia Day' or the 'Foundation Day'.

The First settlers occupied a narrow strip hemmed in between the Pacific and the great wall of Blue Mountains. Among them were farmers, artisans and skilled workers. The settlers had the toughest jobs to keep themselves going, and understandably their first urge was to find a way through the mountains to the vast fertile plains rolling westwards. They succeeded in it and began pushing into the interior for agriculture. Meanwhile explorers by sea had mapped out the shape of the new continent by circumnavigating it. Midshipman Flinders named the continent 'Australia'.

The early character of the settlement was soon submerged in the tide of free settlers. They arrived in two waves. The first wave arrived in between 1820 and 1840, were farmers and yeomen from England. They adopted pastoral life to which they were accustomed in their home country. Introduction of a special variety sheep called 'Merino' in 1796 had already made wool industry profitable. The rapid growth of wool industry after the 1820s made it an important base for Australian economy. Because sheep-farming required vast fields and a small work force, each colony tended to develop a single urban centre, usually near a port. In 1829 settlers founded Perth in Western Australia, in 1833, Melbourne in the Port Phillip district in the then New South Wales, in 1836, Adelaide in South Australia.

The second wave of free settlers arrived in the 1850s. They were adventurers from Britain, America, France and Germany. It was the discovery of large gold deposits in New South Wales and Victoria that lured them 'Gold Rush', as this migratory movement is called, was important in many ways. It altered the ethnic composition of the population. It also effected a change in social structure. Until 1860 the 'squatters', as the wealthy and socially prominent element in the Australian society was known, were in power. Gradually power shifted over to enterprising 'diggers', 'gold challenged wool'. Gold mining and allied activities gave a fillip to trade unionism which created an atmosphere conducive to the growth of democracy.

By 1860 a new economic pattern began to emerge. Craze for gold subsided. Priority shifted over again to agriculture and farming to feed the population which had increased from 45,000 in 1850 to 1,146,000 in 1860. Government and private enterprisers invested more and more in wheat farming, sugar cultivation and dairy farming. Production moved ahead with the mechanisation of agriculture. A net-work of railways built at this time boosted trade and industry. And as domestic market expanded, the idea that the future of Australia depended on manufacturing industries gained strength.

Towards Federation.

Emergence of a new class of free settlers, trade unionism and a growing economy inevitably paved the way for liberalism and consequent movement towards self-government. The continent was no longer an exclusive colony for convicts. New generations without the stigma of crime attached to them had come up and they demanded self government. By 1840 convicts and their descendant constituted only 25% of the population as a result of cessations of transportation of criminals from England in 1838 in response to public demand. However, it continued on a diminishing scale for another twenty years to the remoter colony of West Australia. The Constitutional Act of 1842 gave self government to New South Wales. In 1855 the British Parliament passed the Australian Colonies Government Act which allowed the Australian colonies to have their own legislature. In the same year Victoria separated from New South Wales and formed its own government. The Southern Australian settlement also received its charter of self government at the same time. Van Dieman's Land became Tasmania, and formed its representative government in 1855. Thus six autonomous states developed along much the same political and social lines. Since all the states had similar problems, they tended to imitate each other's solution.

The political movement got a further impetus. In the midst of world wide financial depression of 1890s a serious shipping, shearing and mining strike erupted in Australia. The effects of the strike were intensified by tremendous draught which reduced the number of sheep and cattle. In the turmoil trade unionism grew in importance and the first politically oriented Labour party emerged.

Recovery from the depression of 1890s was reasonably quick mainly due to rising export prices. The economy brightened up. In 1897-1898 a convention met to draft a federal constitution. In 1900 Britain accepted a federal political framework for Australia and the Commonwealth of Australia came into being on January 1, 1901.

Federation and After

A significant development between 1901 and the outbreak of World War-I was the political impact of the Labour party organized in 1891. Trade Unions saw the need for political support for social welfare legislation but the Labour party, representing the trade unions entered federal politics reluctantly. It felt the best prospects for success lay in influencing the state governments. As a result of Labour persuasion, the government was forced to adopt a 'White Australia' policy by which orientals were to be kept out. But implementation of Labour programme was halted for want of the electorate's approval. In 1915 there was a split in the Labour party over the question of conscription, and a National party under the leadership of Prime Minister William Morris Hughes emerged, politically opposed to the Labour party. Hughes fought against the League of Nations' proposal to replace the White Australia policy by racial equality. After the War, the government came under the coalition of the Nationalists and a new party called the Country party. War production over, there was a post-War recession, exports declined and industries slackened. The world wide depression of 1930s hit Australia hard due to fall in export prices. Labour regained power in 1929 but lost in 1931, unable to overcome the depression situation. The formation of the United Australia party helped to meet the situation with sound finance. The period from 1920 onwards was a period of renewed vitality. By the time of World War-II, Australia under Prime Minister Robert Gordon Menzies had considerable industrial and war potential and helped the war efforts by supply of men and resources in a greater degree than during World War-I.

The war shelled the policy of aloofness in foreign affairs. The country's own foreign service which was established only in 1935 was largely in British hands in return for Australia's defence. The developments in the Pacific leading to the bombing of Pearl Harbour by the Japanese had aroused a consciousness of danger from a quarter which was not foreseen, and Australia turned to U S A when Britain failed to provide assured defence. When Singapore fell to the Japanese in 1942, the course was set for greater Australian U S collaboration. Robert Gordon Menzies lead a coalition government (of the Country party and the Liberal party) when took over from the Labour party. He assumed control of additional powers over the states, he also made a beginning in relaxing immigration regulations. By 1950 Australia established diplomatic relations with many countries. She took active interest in the formation of the U N and the Indonesian Republic. Hark Holt became the Prime Minister in 1966 and continued his predecessor's policy until his death in 1967. The present Prime Minister John Horton succeeded in January 1968. He is pledged to continue Holt's foreign policy.

The Land and People

The history of Australia has been greatly influenced by her geographical position and environment. Australia is the last of all countries to be discovered and this was due to her remoteness from other parts of the world. This island continent in the southern hemisphere is bounded on the north by the Timor Sea and the Arafura Sea, on the east by the Coral Sea, the Pacific Ocean and the Tasmanian Sea and on the south and west by the Indian ocean. Bass Strait separates the island of Tasmania from the Australian main land. As might be expected in such a large continent, the climate and terrain is of bewildering variety. The country contains some of the oldest and most stable portions of the earth's surface. Some geologists are of opinion that Australia must once have formed part of an ancient continent known as Gondwana land consisting of Africa, parts of Indian sub continent, Brazil, and Australia. The land consists of three main regions the Western Plateau, the central lowlands and the eastern highlands. The Western Plateau occupies approximately the western half of the continent. It has an average elevation of about 1,200 feet. More than one third of the country is a hot desert having rain fall 10 inches or less. Less than one-third has rainfall between 10 and 20 inches, and may be classified as semi arid. Only a small proportion has rainfall over 30 inches. A mountain range follows the eastern coast at an average distance of about fifty miles from the sea. The panoramic green belt between this mountain range and the coast has comparatively higher rainfall. A much smaller green belt fills the south western corner of the continent. The rest grades into a dead desert at the centre. Because of the limited rainfall over a large area and other unfavourable climatic factors, the population is concentrated mainly in the more equable areas in the east, south east and the south-west.

The Aborigines

When white people came to Australia there were about 500 aboriginal tribes of about 300,000 people, but there are now not more than 47,000 of them. Australia has much cause for pride and interest in her aboriginal race, which from the earliest days has been of great service to Europeans, without gaining much in return. A comparatively small proportion of them remain truly nomads still while the majority have gravitated towards various settlements. In recent years there have been improvements in their life and habits which may well assure them a permanent, useful and interesting place in the life of the country. Later, with the sweeping change in the complexion of the population owing to population growth, migration and economic factors, a tendency for urbanization set in.

Growth of Urban Life

Today, Australia is one of the most urbanized countries of the world. 80% of the people are city-dwellers. The concentration of population is in a few of the largest cities. The pace of post-War industrialization has forced the cities to expand. As the main ports, the six state capitals have attracted industries and population. A third of the town dwellers work in factories. Metals, food, clothing and textiles constitute the largest industries. Another third work in commercial offices, State departments and in the professions. The remaining third work in transport and communications, amusements, cafes, personal services, etc. Industrial and commercial development is the main force at work in Australian cities. Facilities of transport and communication have enabled industries acquire an economic capacity which allows them to offer comparatively high wages and share of profits to workmen. The busy cities have provided the best areas of the world for white settlement. Among the bigger cities, Sydney is the oldest and largest with a population of 2,500,000 people. It is a maritime city taking much of its shape from the ocean lying at its doorstep. Its expansion is carrying it towards its industrial neighbours—Newcastle in the north and Wollongong in the south. Demographers estimate that by the end of the century the three cities will be linked in a single complex containing 6,000,000 people along a 200 mile coastline.

The Federal capital, Canberra is the biggest inland city with a population of 112,000. It is a tourist city attracting people from all over Australia and abroad.

Melbourne (population 2,200,000) is gracious, famous for its broad streets lined with trees, and botanical gardens stretching from the centre of the city. It is a centre of commerce and industry. Cheap power from the brown coal deposits of the Latrobe Valley has attracted many industries to Melbourne. It is also a cultural centre. The Victorian Art Centre has a fine art collection.

The other four state capitals have their own distinctive character. Brisbane (population, 719,000) is a tropical city known for its bougainvillaea, hibiscus and frangipani. Adelaide (population, 726,000) is a planned city with wide streets and broad parklands. Perth (population, 500,000) takes its character from its Mediterranean climate and its isolation from other capitals. Hobart (population, 110,000) reflects the quiet charm of its early Georgian architecture. Darwin (population, 20,261) is the administrative capital of the Northern Territory. It is a colourful town of many nationalities which enjoys the relaxed life of the tropics.

The Australians of today constitute a dynamic people with a robust outlook on life reflecting the qualities that have gone into the making of their history. They have produced a new pattern of community life sprung from the new environment which may almost be identified as typically Australian.

Focus on Migration

Like Canada, Australia is a land of immigrants. A century and a half of immigration has brought into the land people of different stocks mainly European, with different inherited ideas and outlook. The welding of the immigrants, in themselves a variety of apparently incompatible types, into a nation with a common way of life and outlook is an achievement of which every Australian can be proud of. The country they came to occupy was in startling contrast to everything they had known in their European homelands. The soil, seasons and vegetation were all unexpected, unfamiliar, and in some respects repellent. The feeling of remoteness and loneliness was oppressive. Variations in climate were anything but to which they had been accustomed. Fusion of different ethnic groups, however, was made easier by the very hazards of the country and the common dangers they had to meet in their new environment.

Migration from Asia

Until the 'gold rush' of 1850s Australian population consisted entirely of the aboriginal tribes and the descendants of the early settlers. The 'gold rush' brought in not only other European adventurers from France, Germany, Spain, Holland, etc, but also the Chinese. It is estimated that there were as many as 42,000 Chinese in the Victoria gold fields at the time of the 'gold rush'. Most of them went back to China when the alluvial gold was exhausted. The Chinese were never interested in permanent settlement. The only district which received any substantial number of Chinese as permanent settlers was the high rainfall area in the Queensland coast, centering around the now flourishing town, Innisfail. Most of the Chinese in this district became Christians, inter married with the whites and readily assimilated with the Australian population. Descendants of the Chinese in this district engaged in commerce, and not in farming. Now they constitute some of the wealthiest and highly regarded families. According to the 1954 census, the Chinese in Australia numbered 10,000. The Chinese have always excelled as market gardeners, furniture makers, store keepers, and domestic helpers. That U.S.A. was encouraging the Chinese settlements in California and Honolulu at the time of the 'gold rush' must have created a more favourable attitude towards them in Australia also. Gradually Chinese migration began to be looked upon with resentment. In the beginning of the nineteenth century Chinese migration was checked.

When sugar cane cultivation began in Queensland, it was taken for granted that white men could not do field work in this climate, and the Chinese settlers who found that they could make good living as traders, cooks, gardeners etc., were not willing to undertake it either. Therefore, 'indentured labourers' from the Pacific Islands were brought in. In 1907 these islanders and their descendants known as Kanakas were given the opportunity of repatriation. Most of them went back and the minority who decided to remain assimilated with the Australian population.

The Japanese immigrants constitute mainly merchants associated with the wool industry. Another group of Japanese work in the tropics and keep the pearl industry alive. Japanese craftsmen are hardworking people and have contributed significantly to Australian industries.

No large scale migration of Indians occurred in the nineteenth century though India had contacts with Australia. In spite of slow communication by ships rounding the Cape, Australia helped the British rule in India by supplying contingents to nip the 1857 Indian Mutiny in the bud. Because of the restriction of coloured immigrants, there could be no large-scale immigration of Indians till the early twentieth century. According to 1954 census there were 15,000 Indians in Australia. After the relaxation of immigration regulations in 1966, 6342 Indians have been approved for migration to Australia, now Indians form the largest single ethnic group in the non European community (Refer Table B)

Besides the Chinese, other Asians who came to Australia were a few men who described themselves as Afgans. They made good living, before the advent of motor transport, in operating camel transport in Central Australia which is too dry to support horses

Migration from Europe

The only Europeans who migrated to Australia in any appreciable numbers in the nineteenth century were the Germans. Most of them settled in South Australia and a few in Queensland. The descendants of these Germans remained a closed community but eventually identified themselves with the Australians. In World War-I a great many of German descendants fought in the Australian army, and there was hardly an trace of pro-German sympathy. It was they who started the first woollen mills in Lobethal. A large winery was also started by them near Tanunda. The German population which was 8863 by 1869, reached 31,000, according to census in June 1954.

In 1881 the Italians had a settlement in New South Wales and they had played a worthy part in developing the North Coast district. In 1891, they were encouraged to enter Queensland as labourers in the canefields. When U.S.A. restricted immigration, many Italians flocked to Australia in the 1920s and naturally settled down in the northern canefields near their country men. First to come were the Maltese who could claim British nationality. The Italians showed special aptitude for hard physical labour in a hot climate. They showed great capacity for team work and cooperation. Unlike the Germans, the Italians were completely assimilated with the Australian population in a single generation. Their population according to census in June 1954 was 92,000.

The Greeks who came in successive immigration waves tended to cluster in the cities. Their stronghold is Sydney from where two Greek newspapers are published. Many of the fish and fruit shops and the cheap lodgings in Sydney and Melbourne are run by the Greeks. The number of Greeks in the population according to census in June 1954 was 18,000.

The Jews also tended to flock to capital cities. They constitute valuable citizens. According to 1921 statistics, 87% of Australian Jews lived in six capital cities, 40% being in Sydney.

In addition to the above races the Australian population according to census taken in June 1954 consisted of 49,000 Polish, 22,000 Russians, 18,000 Jugo Slav and 17,000 Dutch. Each of these has played a characteristic role in the development of the country's economy. The present population is 95% British origin.

Migration and Population Growth

The aboriginal population of Australia has always evaded any statistical verification. Their number at the time of the European settlement was estimated at 300,000. Now they live mainly in the north western part of Western Australia, north eastern region of Queensland and Northern Territory. Their growth rate is very low—as low as 0.05% a year, and their present number is estimated to be about 47,000.

Regular statistics is available of the population of white inhabitants from the period of settlement to enable a periodical review of its growth. The population of European and mixed descent had risen from 1030 at the end of 1788 to 2056 at the end of 1790. In the next two decades the growth was not proportionate. In 1810 the population rose to only 11,566. Between 1810 and 1820 it had trebled. The introduction of women settlers into a population hitherto overwhelmingly male was contributory to it. The growth of population in the 1840s was mainly from migration. Any how, the role of migration in the population growth till 1861 is largely a guess-work since the military authorities were not careful to maintain proper records of birth and death, and of migration figures. But the available records go to show that migration contributed more than natural growth after 1851.

From 1861 onwards detailed statistics is available showing the rate of growth of population, distinguishing it from the net gain in population growth from migration. The three decades following 1861 saw population growth at the rate of 40% a decade. Natural increase which was gradually coming down during this period, was only 25% per decade. In the 1860s population growth due to migration was about 1% a year. The 'gold rush' of the 1850s and the development of Queensland attracted fresh settlers. In the 1880s migration reached its peak value. A net immigration of $1\frac{1}{2}\%$ was kept up all throughout this decade. A most remarkable phenomenon was that the population of Queensland increased by 85% in this decade.

The migration figure never reached the 1890 figure— $1\frac{1}{2}\%$ per year, but it recovered moderately. For the period 1911-1914 and 1921-27 it stood at a fair rate of 0.7% a year. Australian business conditions were generally deteriorating from 1927 onwards. The 1930s were as slack as the 1890s. Net immigration became negative. But before the end of 1930 immigration again became positive. At this time Australia was beginning to receive a few racial and political refugees from Germany, Czechoslovakia and Italy. Their number was small, but it created an atmosphere to receive the European migrants who were to come after the war. After the war, migration was resumed on a big scale. The Commonwealth Government provided shipping and concessional fares; the State governments provided temporary housing accommodation and looked after the migrants, welfare. By 1948 the rate of net immigration was back at 0.7% a year. For the next two years when 'displaced persons' from Europe were being admitted in very large numbers, the figure rose to the unprecedented height of 1.9% per year. By 1951, it was down to 1.3% and in the succeeding year, with a certain amount of unemployment then prevailing in Australia, a reduction was made in the number of assisted passages offered. The rate of immigration fell to 0.5% in 1953, but the latest figures indicated that it is now back to a rate of 1% or nearly 100,000 per year, which rate will, it is presumed, be maintained fairly steadily into the future.

Australia Needs More Manpower

Attraction of high wages is one of the major factors that favour immigration to Australia. Australia is a high wage country. The level of wages is at least 25% higher than British, and probably not far out of line with the level of wages in Canada, New Zealand and other countries. The immigrants brought with them trade-union ideologies which began to sprout in the new soil. Even before Federation, the State Governments had become aware of the need to avoid social ills and had introduced a code for factories and a minimum wage. When the Federal government was established, a system of compulsory arbitration for the settlement of industrial disputes was introduced with fair conditions of work. The industrial interests of the workers were safeguarded by the Labour in State and Federal politics.

Australia stands today in an enviable position of having a large unsaturated continent stretching inwards at her disposal with by no means the largest population it can support. Even in the last decade of this century, the North-West had been branded as a 'land beyond the Never-Never'. Today, conditions have changed and one can see a break-through in all spheres.

of development. This once perverse region is now surrendering treasures beyond the wildest dreams of the early pioneers. The difficulties of terrain that had awed the earlier colonizers have now bowed down to gigantic development schemes that are under way. The country now offers vast scope of future development which will absorb millions of future settlers.

All the advanced nations of the world are moving in the same direction. The economic factor is the determinant, and turns on the question of remunerative employment. Since Australia's massive immigration programme was launched 25 years ago, more than 2½ million people, mainly Britons, Irish and Europeans have been brought in by the Australian Government to fulfill urgent labour and economic needs. There can be little doubt that Australia's buoyant economy, especially in the field of mineral development and growth of manufacturing industries has created a need for more immigrants in the future. Her population has doubled in the last half a century in which the proportion of immigrants is by and large great.

The 'White Australia' Policy

Whoever in India visualises an opportunity to migrate to Australia is likely to be intrigued by the problem "how to make peace with 'White Australia' policy". There can be no doubt that the image of Australia suffers on account of this controversial policy, but much of the criticism against it will be better comprehensible if the underlying forces are understood in the proper perspective.

Policy takes Shape

Re capitulation of some of the events that influenced migration during the pre Federation period will be illuminating. One of the conspicuous features about migration to Australia is the tendency for migration and economic development to come almost simultaneously in sudden violent waves with long periods of quiescence in between. When the transport of convicts from Britain to the Australian colonies ended, some employers sought to bring in workers from Asian countries to reduce labour shortage. The 'gold rush' in the mid nineteenth century brought substantial number of Asian workers to Australia. During the 1860s the net immigration was at the rate of 1% a year. In the early years of migration Britishers as well as Asiatics were lured by the discovery of gold deposits. In those days there was no wide spread feeling against migrants from the orient. Some 20,000 Chinese had migrated to Victoria by 1857, and there were soon about 13,000 in New South Wales. The Chinese lived as closed communities and aimed at taking as much gold as possible to their country. Gradually their presence created serious social disturbances, riots against the Chinese competition broke out. The colonies had power to make independent fiscal and immigration policies. In 1856 Victoria passed restrictive legislation against the Chinese, New South Wales and Queensland followed soon. The labour voters who resented the Chinese competition argued that it was necessary to create a federal government with a single immigration law, because they were afraid otherwise the Chinese could take advantage of the law of any colony, and once entered would freely travel anywhere in Australia. The recruitment, of Pacific Islanders as indentured labourers for the Queensland cane-fields beginning in 1863 and continuing over a period of 40 years, also caused very serious concern as the colonies developed towards Federation. Recruitment, employment and living conditions aroused ever increasing controversy as well as Governmental controls. Opposition grew against the entry of any worker who was ready to accept comparatively lower wages. It was in these circumstances that in 1877 a steamship company employed Chinese on coastal ships at a rate considerably lower than Australian seamen's rates, and seamen's strike led to wide-spread and intense feelings.

These and other developments introduced a general demand for a national immigration policy and its administration. A policy of virtual exclusion of non Europeans was adopted in the Federal Parliament with near unanimity. However, even in those days when the British opinion did not have to bother very much about what the rest of the world thought, it was understood that legislation specially excluding migrants from any particular country would cause diplomatic embarrassment to the British Government. So at the time of Federation Australia did not enact any 'White Australia' legislation as such, as is generally believed even by Australians, but the accepted policy left considerable discretionary powers with the Minister to apply the principle of exclusion at his will. This aspect figures in a humorous incident quoted below related by Colin Clark, formerly Under Secretary of State for Labour and Industry and Economic Adviser to the Government of Queensland in his book 'Australian Hopes and Fears'.

"Less expected was my own experience when visiting an Asian country (not India) to transact some official business I was met by an official of the country's Foreign office who immediately began asking about the 'White Australia' policy. Making as diplomatic a reply as I could, I said that Australia did not have a specific Act of Parliament on this subject, merely discretionary powers for the Minister to make administrative rules about the immigrants whom he would admit 'I am very sorry to hear that', the official gravely replied, 'I had hoped that Australia had some legislation which we would be able to copy without too much offence, in order to keep the Indians out of our country "

The Immigration Restriction Act passed in 1901 embodied provisions enabling the Government to implement this policy at its discretion. Asians were excluded by administrative action on the Minister's part. The Minister for Immigration was empowered to exclude any person under the terms of a particularly grotesque clause in the Act, which entitled him to impose a dictation test in any European language. It is interesting to remember that this rule nearly broke down on one occasion, when the Minister was seeking to exclude a certain European visitor on political grounds, this visitor was capable of passing a dictation test in every European language they could think of, finally a police sergeant relieved the situation. He gave him a test in Gaelic (a European language of minor importance)

Three factors which are peculiar to Australia come to the picture when examining the 'White Australia' policy. Geographical isolation is a salient factor which explains Australian people's seemingly parochial outlook and ignorance about the neighbouring Asian and other peoples. Bordering the country on the north are about 440 million Indians, nearly 450 million Chinese and a hundred million Japanese. The Empire of Japan once reached to the borders of Australia. Yet, the rank and file of Australians, for considerable period, knew nothing of these environments or of their effect on the security of the Australian inhabitants. The existence of the huge over-populated areas to the north menacing their country mattered little to them, though that indeed was much that was really geographic about Australia itself

Another factor which promoted the parochial outlook is Australian pre occupation with problems of local development. Australian attitude to overseas countries could not take a tangible shape owing to divisions in Australian domestic politics and the too frequent concentration of parties and people upon developments at home. Foreign affairs was of little concern to the common people. When the war broke out, they showed an undue dependence on the Royal Navy and other resources of the British Empire fighting shoulder to shoulder with Britons and displaying a sense of solidarity and loyalty to them to preserve the common cause of democracy.

A third factor which influenced Australian attitude towards people of neighbouring countries is her racial ties with Britain and her Anglo-Saxon outlook. These tended to retard closer relations with non British people. This pro British feeling was carried to such an extent that whenever the question of immigration was considered an economic necessity, Australia thought of filling up the continent with British, or at any rate, 'white' or European settlers, rather than allowing the nation to be 'swamped' by Asiatics, who they considered were comparatively of low standard of living. The cumulative effect of all these factors was the adoption of the 'White Australia' policy.

The lack of knowledge of Asians betrayed a lack of sense of world community. For most Australian's the outbreak of World War—I was a sharp challenge to preoccupation with local development and too excessive reliance on British policy, shaped and directed in London. Service on European battlefields gave the right to participation in the councils of peace, but domestic politics in the early post-war years continued to throw organised labour into an isolationist mood Australian politicians gave mere lip service to their membership of the League of Nations. In fact, Australians remained substantially ignorant and largely indifferent to the major issues of the League of Nations in the first ten years of its history. It was only after the Second World War that a better sense of world community dawned on certain sections of Australian people which found expression in the criticism of 'White Australia' policy.

Second World War—An Eye Opener

The confrontation with a major oriental power in the second World War aroused the Australian people to a realisation of dangers as well as opportunities of their geographical position. The rapid sequence of events from the attack of Pearl Harbour to the fall of Singapore came as a rude shock to the complacency of most Australians. In the years immediately following the Second World War, Australians became more and more mindful of their peculiar geographical situation. The official policy of the Australian Government also reflected a national realisation of the significant pattern of Australia's immediate geographic environment. Simultaneously it showed trends of a new consciousness among Australians of the need to consider more carefully the repercussions of Australia's policy, domestic and foreign upon countries to her 'near north', if not elsewhere. The Second World War had revealed the markedly changed conditions of the world strategy where excessive reliance on British policy would have no more the same relevance. A stronger and better informed sense of world community replaced the old parochialism. The old apathy and indifference to the affairs of the outside world gave place to a recognition that Australia would be deeply affected by major developments overseas and that she could make substantially effective contribution towards the larger issues of the world affairs by pursuing an independent national policy, especially in regard to her neighbouring countries.

The New Immigration Policy— Its Working

The post-War period saw Australia moving towards real and active involvement in the Asian Pacific region in the long-term Australian interest. She has discovered a new interest in the South-East Asian region. She has begun to look upon the Far-East as the 'Near North'. This new vision has its repercussions in the application of restrictive immigration policy on Asians. Even in the early post-War years some opposition to the rigorous application of the Act took a head. Australians reacted sufficiently strongly against the action of the then Minister of Immigration who applied the policy for enforcement of the return of Asians who had been given shelter in Australia during the war years. But the immigration policy remained essentially unchanged though after the Second World War, some provisions were added for temporary entry of persons such as visitors, students and assistants in Asian business.

From 1947 to 1960 a series of Governmental decisions modified the restrictions. When in 1956 the Government reviewed the policy which had been followed since Federation of not admitting persons of non European origin for permanent residence, it introduced several significant reforms. Those people who had already settled in Australia became eligible to be naturalised, the admission for permanent residence of immediate relatives (spouses and dependent relatives) of Australian citizens was authorised and it was made possible for highly qualified people to come to Australia for indefinite stay, through temporary permits. Then in 1964 the rules governing the entry of persons of mixed descent were revised. Immigration legislation was comprehensively reformed, including the abolition of the dictation test.

Following a comprehensive review of the immigration policy, the Commonwealth Government, in March 1966, decided upon two further measures which constitute some important reforms, not, however, departing from the fundamental principles of the immigration policy

First, it was decided that non-European people who had been initially admitted to Australia as temporary residents (holding temporary permit) but who were likely to be in Australia indefinitely should not have to wait 15 years before applying for resident status and citizenship, but should be able to apply after five years' residence. This enabled a backlog of applicants who had spent five years in Australia becoming entitled to permanent residence and enabled many of them to bring their families to Australia much earlier than would otherwise have been possible, thus ending a situation often criticised for its effect on individuals and families.

The two main categories of people benefited by the elimination of the fifteen-year rule are

- * the highly qualified Asians admitted in recent years for indefinite stay, but on temporary permits;
- * Chinese admitted before 1956 who if they left Australia could go back only to Communist China. By a decision of the Government in 1956 they were allowed to stay, but lacking the status of settlers and citizens they have been unable to bring their wives and children to Australia.

The most important benefit of the Government's decision to abolish the so-called '15-year-rule' was to enable many families who have been separated for some years to be re-united much sooner than would have been possible under the old rule.

Secondly, it was decided that applications for entry by well-qualified people wishing to settle in Australia will be considered on the basis of their suitability as settlers, their ability to integrate readily and their possession of qualifications which are positively useful to Australia. They will be able after five years' stay on temporary permits to apply for resident status and citizenship, and also to bring their immediate families with them on first arrival.

No annual quota is contemplated. The number of people entering in relation to Australia's present population will be somewhat greater but it will be controlled by a careful assessment of the individual's qualifications. The basic aim of preserving a homogeneous society will be maintained. The changes are, of course, not intended to meet general labour shortage, or to permit the large-scale admission of workers from Asia, but the widening of the eligibility will help to fill some of Australia's special needs.

The decision did not include an exhaustive list of eligible categories of persons, but as a guide to the Government's thinking examples are given of those who, under the new decision, will be admitted in numbers greater than previously.

- persons with specialised technical skills for appointments for which local residents are not available,
- persons nominated by responsible authorities or institutions for specific important professional appointments which otherwise would remain unfilled,
- persons of high attainment in the arts and sciences or of prominent achievements in other ways,
- executives, technicians and other specialists who have spent substantial periods in Australia, for example with the branches in Australia of large Asian companies and who have qualifications or experience in positive demand in Australia.

- * Businessmen who in their own countries have been engaged in substantial international trading and would be able to carry on such trade from Australia,
- * persons who have been of particular and lasting help to Australia's interest abroad in trade or in other ways,
- * persons who by former residence in Australia or by association with Australian citizens have demonstrated an interest in or identification with Australia that should make their future residence in the country feasible

Experience showed that there were suitable un-nominated applicants available to assist in meeting demands for qualified people in some of the professions, such as branches of medicine, and the Government decided that, subject to the general requirements of suitability for settlement and ability to integrate, applicants who were 'eligible to practise in professions in which they could readily be absorbed' should be approved

Applications by persons in the above listed categories and others in comparable circumstances will be eligible for consideration on an individual basis. Those admitted will be able to apply for resident status and citizenship after five years' stay

In promulgating the revised immigration policy, the then Minister of Immigration assured the House that humanity and discretion will, as in the past, mark the handling of individual cases in the migration field generally, 'always with Australia's interest in view, and always in the hope of showing sympathy and consideration to men and women in difficulty, always avoiding unnecessary disclosure of private confidence or misfortune'

The announcement of the revised policy in March 1966 concluded on the note that both the policy and the rules and procedures by which it is effected cannot remain static and must be constantly reviewed. This process of constant review will continue. 'It will depend on humanitarian and international considerations, broad national interest, the accumulating experience of present laws and policies and their administration and the need to promote integration and to avoid risks of permanent minorities within the Australian community.'

Though re-defined from time to time, the policy rules and procedures will be administered in accordance with the law on principles decided by the Government with justice to individuals and for the future welfare of the Australian people as a whole.

More non-Europeans Admitted

A positive element in the latest changes is that it will admit selected non Europeans capable of becoming Australian and joining in Australia's national development. The changes are aimed at accomplishing some increase in the number of non-European settlers within the continuing objective of a predominantly homogeneous society.

Following the Government's decision in March 1966, the Australian Government has approved the entry for residence of approximately 6,342 well qualified people (including dependants) as on September 30, 1970. They consist of various racial groups. Very few of them would have been able to enter Australia under the policy before 1966. They came mainly from countries like India, Hongkong, Malaysia, Burma, Singapore, Indonesia, Ceylon, Philippines, Kenya, Mauritius, Saudi Arabia and Pakistan. The remainder were former residents of 41 other countries. They included 550 medical practitioners, 419 engineers, 125 nurses, 58 architects, 80 accountants, 53 chemists, excluding pharmacists, and 304 teachers. The remainder were spread over 62 other occupations.

A break-down of the figures (Source Department of Immigration) showing applications for non-European immigration approved as at September 30 1970 appears in Table A. Table B shows the figures classified under broad racial groupings. Table C categorizes them by country of origin, further broken down by ethnic group. Table D shows the occupational classifications. It will be seen from Table B that Indians-in an ethnic sense are now the largest group numerically.

None of the figures given in the above Tables relates to people granted the status of residents after entering for temporary stay, or to people admitted on the basis of relationship to residents of Australia. Between March 1966 and March 1970 approximately 5,000 temporary residents had qualified on various grounds for permanent residence. Besides, 4,000 relatives of people already residing in Australia had arrived sooner than would have been possible before March 1966. The figures pertaining to persons of non European descent admitted on basis of relationship to persons other than students annually between 1966 and 1970 are shown in Table E. Table F gives the statistics of students granted resident status during recent years and their dependants, indicating reasons for which settlement was permitted,

Part-European Immigrants

Table G shows a statement of arrivals of persons of mixed descent (part European). They are now coming at the rate of about 6,000 a year, largely because part-European settlers of whom some 31,000 had arrived between the Second World War and July 1970 have wider rights to bring in relatives than have part-Europeans. (Until 1964, people of partly non-European descent were eligible to enter Australia if they were of predominantly European appearance. This failed to take account of important factors such as hardship, qualifications, or relationship to residents of Australia, and in 1964 the Government substituted for the earlier rule a policy allowing these factors to be considered Since 1945 some 31,000 people of mixed descent have settled in Australia) Their relatives are let in without regard being paid to their colour etc., and in this way a growing number of part-Europeans are now finding entry who are likely to be taken as non Europeans by the Australian host community

Temporary Visitors and Students

Quite separate provisions exist for temporary entry of visitors and students They are not entitled to stay in Australia indefinitely The provisions applying to the entry of settlers do not apply to them The most temporary entrants are short-term visitors Another important group comprises more than 11,000 students chiefly from Asian and Pacific countries , 1,600 of the students are in Australia under schemes of Government sponsorship and the remainder are private students admitted for education and training which will be of value to their own countries In the case of students, the Government's policy statement emphasized that 'it would be quite wrong and most unfair to the development of countries whence they came to offer to the 11,000 Asian Students in Australia the right to settle in the country after five years' study The objective of admitting these young people to use educational facilities which are both expensive to the Australian Government and in great demand is to help the students' homelands by increasing their numbers of qualified people The Government's decision, therefore, does not relate to people expected to leave Australia after limited temporary residence, but does apply to those who have been in Australia for long periods or who are likely to be allowed to stay indefinitely

The Government has assured that the programme of allowing young people to come from other countries as students will continue Greater efforts will be made to ensure that the courses undertaken will be of recognized value to the students' homelands when they return there In view of the need to ensure most effective use of scarce places at Australian universities and other institutions, the intending student's ability to undertake his course successfully will be examined carefully at the time of application for entry and his progress will be assessed annually

Looking Ahead

The position at present is that non-Europeans are being approved for settlement in Australia at the rate of about 4,000 a year. Roughly 3,000 of these are immigrants regarded by the Department of Immigration as being 'well-qualified' in an occupational sense, plus their dependants. The numbers coming from any one developing country have not been such as to evoke concern over depriving such countries of badly needed qualified people. Where the governments of the applicants' countries may be concerned over loss of qualified people, there will be appropriate consultation, as Australia must not contradict the aims of the Colombo Plan and other efforts to help such countries' development. The remaining thousand are non-European students already in Australia who have been allowed to stay on, usually because they have married Australians or because their qualifications are not in demand at home, dependants and other relatives of these students, and other non-Europeans admitted on a basis of relationship.

Australian policy on non-European immigration has steadily liberalized even within the period since the important policy changes of March 1966; and the estimates given are based on figures for the last twelve months for which data are available. It may reasonably be assumed that in future the number of non-Europeans admitted on the basis of relationship to persons other than former students is likely to fall somewhat, chiefly because the tragedies of family separation which were such a deplorable outcome of Australian policy before March 1, 1966 have now been ended.

Whither Immigration Policy ?

Will Australia open her doors wide for Asian immigrants in the near future ? If not, where is the scope for migration on a larger scale than at present ? These are genuine questions which may arise in the mind of an Indian who is interested in Australia. And on the face of it, the 'White Australia' policy appears sound, rooted in history and economically viable. Elsewhere in this book we have seen that the competition of Chinese labour had served as a hand-lever to prop up the racial policy. Over the years, politicians and economists have been adding plausible defences to sustain the policy and to cover up its racial hue. But how long will they be able to hold on ? When we probe into some of the arguments put up by protagonists of 'White' Australia we can be confident that they will not stand long against time and history. History is metabolic so is the policy of a nation. It has to move with time, or time will drag it on.

Foremost of the arguments is that a restrictive policy on migration is needed to keep wages and living conditions at optimum level. This belief is a hang over from the days of Chinese competition and does not hold good at the present day. The assumption that admission of coloured immigrants would whittle down wage rate is contrary to facts. The adverse effect, if at all, that can be anticipated of any marked addition of coloured immigrants can at best be only transitory and will be nullified by the setting in of forces working for economic equilibrium. The coloured immigrant, unlike the Chinese of the past, is alive to the modern concept of equal wage for equal work. Therefore, it would be more rational to suppose that once entered, he would demand and get the same wages as the white men among whom he works. This has been the experience of Indians working in Britain, Africans in France, and Maoris in New Zealand.

Another ingenious argument is that the policy helps preventing social disharmony. The basic aim of the policy is preservation of a homogeneous society. It needs no pedagogy to convince the enlightened Australians of the folly and dangerous implication of this argument as they had been victims of and witnesses to the distress wrought by a World War triggered by history's arch-champion of racial homogeneity. Probably the protagonists had before them examples of the happenings in the southern states of the United States where the white and coloured people found it difficult to co-exist, or they had a premonition of the conflicts in South Africa. Against this, the majority of Australians should be aware of the case of Latin America where the whites, natives and the immigrants from Africa and India live together and make up a homogeneous society without any friction.

The question of immigration when viewed objectively revolves around one incontrovertible factor: it has to be controlled with reference to the specific needs of Australia's manpower requirements, keeping in view the aim of an optimum society. Geographic (central Australia is arid) and climatic (north is tropical) have made the population to concentrate in south and south-east coasts. Large scale migration, the Australian leaders fear, will affect the standard of urban life. With more immigrants veering around big cities where chances of lucrative employment are higher, there has been increasing pressure on education, housing, prices, and health and welfare services. Most non-Government economists have capitalised on this cue and have cautioned that large scale migration hinders rather than helps the economy. To drive home the point, they pointed that immigrants cost between £ 300 and £ 500 million a year—roughly a quarter of nation's export earnings. But can these economists ignore the interrelation of higher wage, consumption and saving, the immigrants who get a higher wage than what they could get in their home country will succumb to conspicuous consumption. They will crave for superior things and the propensity to consume is spiralled up which in turn, results in saving. This saving in national income will eventually convert the drain on immigrants into an investment. Wisely, the Australian government had so far justified migration on grounds of manpower requirements and the expansion of domestic market.

Another argument is that coloured immigrants would be abundant carriers of diseases to which they had become immune, but not the Australians. As a proof, the protagonists claim that Australia never had any outbreak of contagious disease. In the light of developments in pharmacology and immunology, and the strict screening procedure and medical check up of immigrants adopted by Australian missions abroad, this argument fails to convince even the most credulous.

The plea to wipe off vestiges of racialism from the policy has come from within. Enlightened Australians—politicians, educationists and economists—have voiced concern at the continuance of a racial policy while the rest of the world is moving towards universal brotherhood. It was this concern that prompted Dr Kenneth Rivett, Chairman of the New South Wales Association for Immigration Reform, to remark 'It is fair to say that there is no longer a rigid 'White Australia' policy but decisions are still being made on grounds of colour.' We have nowhere to go for evidences of this lurking colour prejudice but to the working of the policy itself. The following curbs still persist.

- For admission of non European migrants 'special qualifications' are insisted ,
- The liberalised policy promulgated in 1966 forbids the coloured immigrants from bringing their adult children, parents (if they are not dependants) and their brothers and sisters ,
- Asians with good knowledge of English who can hold clerical and allied jobs, and who can perhaps improve their qualifications while in Australia are still excluded, so are tradesmen, shopkeepers, etc., while illiterate workers from southern Europe and Turkey are being admitted (Some of them never learn to speak English)

In spite of these, the ball of change has set rolling And Australian leaders are aware of it John Gorton, Prime Minister, told a meeting of the New South Wales Young Liberals in October 1970, that the immigration policy appeared 'unjust' on moral grounds With his characteristic candour he spelt out the reason that though liberalised since 1966, it is easier for a person with a white skin to enter Australia than it is for a person of different colour'. How far the Australian Government proposes to go ahead towards removing the anomalies and with what speed is a matter for conjecture It seems the Government at present does not want to go ahead of public opinion which by all reckoning is gathering momentum

Looking at the liberalisation of 1966, we conclude that the rigid policy has been given a shake-up and a new policy has emerged with some salutary provisions regarding admission of non-European immigrants These are

- non-Europeans other than students can now apply for resident status and citizenship after five years' stay in Australia (instead of fifteen years as it was previously) ;
- they can bring their spouse, minor unmarried children and aged dependants.
- 'well-qualified' non-Europeans are admitted

The provisions have shown tangible results The developments since 1966 augurs well for Indians It is clear that racialism which once characterised the immigration policy is on progressive decline Public opinion within and the developments elsewhere in the world in regard to immigration will accelerate this process. When the few remaining anomalies, which are nevertheless serious in the eyes of an Indian, are done away with, there is scope for increased volume of migration from this sub continent. If Canada and the United States could waive the restrictions and benefit from immigrants, there is no reason why Australia cannot. There are a large number of professionally qualified Asians, including Indians, who speak English fluently and are able to pay their passage, but are still excluded.

One should concede that Australia has the right to decide what sort of immigrants she would admit for the development of her resources. She has also the right to safeguard her society from being split into conclaves of different races leading to social disharmony which, however, is unlikely to happen, as present day nationalism has its roots on geographical boundaries, common government and language rather than on dynasty, race and religion.

The suggestion that Australia should fix quota for each Asian country was not favoured. The reaction of Mr Lynch, Minister for Immigration, was that the quota system would be open to attack on the grounds of discriminating between one country and another. It would, however appear that adoption of quota system will go a long way in removing the misgivings of the Asian people and improving Australia's diplomatic relations. A long-term policy based on racial equality and attuned to manpower requirements will prove to be profitable to Australia and in the event of her adopting this, she will not find productive Indians wanting.

An encouraging sign for the Indians is Australia's current stand on 'assisted passage' to coloured immigrants from Europe. This may turn out to be the first stage of a total ban on Assisted Passage Scheme. Conviction is growing in Australia that the country gains little from this scheme though Britain subsidises it. Statistics reveals that the British make the worst immigrants. The 'assisted passage' is a long cruise for many, one in six returns to Britain as compared to one in nine non-Europeans who are not covered by this scheme. This is in spite of the fact that the British speak the same language and can be easily assimilated into national life. The home sick Briton has thus proved not a compliment to economy while an Asian immigrant who will readily adopt the country, will become an asset to the nation. In all probability, therefore, Australia may scrap the Assisted Passage Scheme in the near future. And once this is done, the annual figure of British migrants will become half of what it is today.

In this jet age of fast communications and shrinking distances, the dividing line between nations is steadily vanishing, giving emergence to the idea of a world family of nations. In this grand concept, national interests will be subordinated to the broader world outlook of universal brotherhood. There can be no doubt that Australia will subscribe to this noble ideal and move fast enough towards this goal. There are clear indications that she will

Growth of Economy

The economic policy of Australia aims at a higher growth rate and providing full employment. She has fairly succeeded in it. In the past two decades Australia's Gross National Product (GNP) has been steadily growing at an average rate of 4.5% a year, and the development of new industries points to an even higher growth rate. A balanced developmental programme ensured the growth of capital-intensive industries side by side with traditional rural industries. In the past decade capital expenditure in manufacturing industries has doubled. Now manufacturing industries contribute to 17% of the total export earning. On the basis of total trade she ranks the thirteenth nation.

Tariff protection and foreign capital have assisted Australia's developmental programme. More than $500 million has been invested in motor car industry, and she is spending about $180 million on expansion programmes designed to increase the indigenous content of car production.

The discovery and development of large metal and mineral deposits in the age-old geological structure of the inland is a major factor in the national growth. In the last quarter of the nineteenth century one of the world's largest silver-lead-zinc deposits was discovered at Broken Hill in New South Wales. One of the biggest gold fields was discovered at Kalgoorlie in West Australia. Vast resources of bauxite-aluminium ore—have been discovered in Queensland, Western Australia and the Northern Territory. Exports of bauxite and aluminium have begun and aluminium processing plants with a planned capacity of more than 2½ million tons have been set up in Queensland and Western Australia. Increased use of aluminium in the building and packaging industries have brought aluminium smelting industry into Tasmania and Victoria

The most exciting development in the last decade has been the discovery of major deposits of iron ore in the north-west of Western Australia. An estimated 15,000 million tons have been located and contracts have been signed for the export of 364 million tons ore to Japan by 1990. The gross value of this export which includes semi-processed pellets is expected to exceed $ 3,000 million. Iron and Steel industry is spending $ 100 million a year to increase the steel making capacity in Newcastle and Port Kembla in New South Wales and at Whyalla in South Australia and to establish a plant at Kwinana in Western Australia. Nickel is another important mineral discovered recently. Exports from the Kalgoorlie area alone will be worth $ 70 million over the next ten years.

Petro-chemical plants producing a wide range of synthetic materials and fertilisers have sprung up around the major oil refineries. The search for oil has resulted in the discovery of deposits of natural gas in Victoria and South Australia and smaller deposits in Queensland. This cheap energy source will be used for industrial and domestic power in Adelaide, Brisbane and Melbourne, and possibly in Sydney. Government assistance has produced significant results in the oil industry.

Despite the developments in capital intensive industries, Australia still depends largely on the rural industries for her prosperity and growth. Primary production figures about three quarters of export income. Wool, wheat and meat are still the top three export earners. Australia is the world's largest wool producer, the second largest sugar exporter and the third largest wheat and butter exporter. Australia is helping the Indian sheep industry by air lifting on mass scale special variety of sheep named 'Corriedale' for the Indo-Australian sheep breeding farm at Hissar (Punjab).

Research helps farmers to attain higher productivity. New fertilisers, pasture species and methods developed to check rabbits have helped to boost agricultural production. Much of the new land development has taken place in the biggest states, Queensland and Western Australia. In Queensland sugar production has almost doubled in the last decade. Vast areas in Western Australia, once considered useless, have been opened up for cultivation by new land development techniques.

In the development field several big national projects are under way. The biggest is the Snowy Mountain project financed by the Federal Government at a cost of $ 800 million. It will provide hydro-electric power for Victoria and New South Wales as well as irrigate the western inland plains. In the north west of Western Australia, the Federal Government is providing $ 60 million towards the construction of a major dam on the Ord River to irrigate about 170,000 acres suitable for cotton and sorghum. A Federal Government grant of $ 20 million has brought another area, Emerald, in Queensland under irrigation.

Expansion programme in both transport and communication facilities keep Australia abreast of other countries in these fields. Australia provides one of the most efficient air-travel systems which operate on the major inter-city routes with well equipped fleets. Rail and road transport facilities are also being developed. A trans continental unified gauge line connects Brisbane in Queensland and Fremantle in Western Australia. Shipping also plays an important part in the inter-state transport. Australia has made vast strides in internal and external communication. International cable systems link Australia with different parts of the world. Australia is also linked to the international communication satellite system through Pacific satellites connected to tracking stations set up in Australia by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration of the United States.

Australia in the World Scene

After the Second World War Australia has been showing greater interest in the affairs of South east Asian countries. As a co-operative member of the Asian and Pacific region she aims at strengthening peace and stability in the region by helping the developing nations. Access to the potential markets and defence security are the factors governing her relationship with these countries.

Since World-War II, Australia has associated herself with programmes for the economic development of south and south east Asian countries. She participates in the Colombo Plan. Up to June 30, 1968 Australia had spent more than $ 155 million on Colombo Plan aid in 15 Asian countries. About two-third has been in the form of direct grants for economic development projects and the rest in the form of expert advice and equipment under a technical cooperation scheme coordinated by member countries. The economic development projects include secondary industries, municipal services, transport and communication facilities, broadcast equipment and lignite mining. More than 1,200 Australian experts have worked in Colombo Plan countries in the last 20 years contributing technical knowledge to the solution of their development problems and taking home direct experience of Asian conditions. About 8,000 Asian students have been trained in Australian universities and technical colleges under Colombo Plan awards.

Australia is a foundation member of the United Nations Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE). She was granted a special position for 17 years as a non-regional member because of her geographical position and regional interests. In 1963 she was admitted to full regional membership in recognition of her growing connection with Asian affairs. Technical and financial assistance is provided by Australia for four major ECAFE projects: the Mekong River Project, the Asian Institute for Economic Development and Planning, the Asian Development Bank and the Asian Highway.

Deeply interested in the security of south east Asia, Australia has provided practical evidence of her readiness to support many countries of the region when their freedom was under attack.

Australia is linked to the United States and to non Communist countries in the region by several mutual security pacts. The ANZUS treaty signed between Australia, New Zealand and the United States in 1951 provided that in the event of an armed attack on any one of them each would act to meet the common danger in accordance with constitutional practice. In 1954 Australia joined with the United States, Britain, France, Pakistan, New Zealand, Thailand and the Philippines in a collective defence treaty known as SEATO. Although SEATO is primarily a defence arrangement, it is also concerned with the economic welfare of the people of the treaty area. Australia is the only member to operate a special SEATO aid programme. More than £ 10 million has been distributed by Australia to three member countries: Pakistan, Thailand and the protocol State of Vietnam.

Australia has exerted her influence in the United Nations. She has been twice a member of the Security Council, three times a member of the Economic and Social Council and a member of the Trusteeship Council since its establishment. She is an executive member of the World Meteorological Organization and the International Telecommunications Union and a member of the board of governors of the International Atomic Agency. Support for the Commonwealth is also a significant aspect of Australian policy.

Australia Today

The achievements of Australia are the results of the hard work of the people in a short span of just over a quarter century. The country is new and the people are young. Novelty stamps everything in Australia, roads, railways, buildings, bridges—all have been built in a generation or two. This bespeaks the genius of the people, and naturally one would search for something common that will mark out a typical Australian. The task is not simple. Being a land of immigrants who came from different countries at different times, beliefs and traditions of practically every country have gone into the making of an individual Australian, and the evolution of a typical Australian character is still a matter of time. Yet, there are things sufficiently common among Australians to be regarded as features of the people as a whole.

Self-reliance and independence are the most common elements in the character of the average Australian. He is practical and has little time for theories. He aims at material success. He dislikes too much discipline and authority. He is friendly and co-operative.

The Australian has zest and pride in attaining high living standards. Full employment and high average income are the basic standards demanded by all political parties. Australia has long subscribed to the principle of social justice. State parliaments legislated for old age pension as early as 1901 and the Federal Parliament legislated for invalid pension and maternity allowance by 1912. An impressive range of social services is now provided by the Federal Government. In the contributory medical benefits scheme Australia has adopted her own approach to social services.

Australians have always regarded an efficient education system as an essential element in a free society. Compulsory education was established in all the colonies by the end of the last century and the literacy rate has been almost 100% for many years. About 75% of school children attend government schools, and the ratio of Government to private spending in the educational field is about 4:1. Since World War II, Australian Government has shown a continuing concern with the improvement and expansion of educational facilities. The number of universities has increased by 50% in the last ten years. Government scholarships scheme provided subsidies to students at school and university level. As a percent of gross national product, expenditure on education has more than doubled in the past twenty years. Nearly 40,000 students from Asia, Africa and the Pacific region have entered Australian universities and schools under government scholarships or private funds. Asian history and language are now taught in schools and universities and more Australians are travelling to South East Asia. This trend is likely to become more pronounced as the younger generation comes to political and administrative responsibility.

Australians to-day have all the confidence that goes with independence, prosperity and the sense of achievement that follows the taming of a raw continent. A high rate of economic growth has brought a sense of challenge in the Australian way of life. The young Australian entering industry feels himself a part of the technological revolution. Since a planned immigration programme began to operate after World-War-II, the larger influx of continental Europeans, Asiatics and Africans has brought a new element of cosmopolitan outlook into the society. Australia's emergence as a developed nation within the short period of her history can undoubtedly be traced to the dynamism and vitality of the people who came to occupy the land from time to time.

List of Employers

Australia is rich in agricultural products and natural deposits. Industrialisation has been rapid and significant. One million people are employed in industries based on steel alone.

The publishers do not vouch for the opportunities that may open with the employers, or that all of them will entertain applications from non Europeans for the vacancies at their disposal. Yet since the existing immigration rules permit specially qualified Asians to enter Australia we list a few employers to enable eligible persons to explore possibilities.

For facile reference note

- i) Index to Code Nos (No in bracket at the end of address line) of Product, Service line Page 58
- ii) Index to page Nos of alphabetically arranged areas Page 63
- iii) Name and address of employers Page 65

The number in bracket at the end of a line is the code number for service, product line and not a part of address itself. The address is complete when read with the area and State under which it is listed.

eg complete the first address on page 65 thus "Sergeant (A) & Co Pty Ltd, Alice St, Brisbane (Q), Australia".
